Title: My Cups are full and I'm ready for School

This session is for anyone who wants to better understand the complex and often confusing concept of School Readiness. The session will provide information and practical strategies to better understand each child, and forward plan practical School Readiness experiences to enhance children's readiness for the transition to school. If you've ever struggled to articulate the learning that occurs through a play-based curriculum to a parent who questions how you are achieving school readiness without the use of phonics, structured counting worksheets and formal "school readiness sessions", this is for you. This session will leave educators with a kit of practical ideas and tools for enhancing their school readiness practices as well as ways to best articulate the learning, life skills and benefits to families.

Presenter: Angie Day has enjoyed a vast array of roles in the education sector for just over a decade. These roles include working as a nominated supervisor, primary teacher, national facilitator, practice coach and NESA supervisor. When reflecting on her early teaching experiences, Angie often references the fact that she was always 'an early childhood educator trapped in the body of a primary teacher' placing the rights of children at the forefront of her practice. Her pedagogy prioritises dispositions and a love of learning and fun as the foundation from which to teach. For Angie, teaching is about ensuring that as often as possible, education at all levels fits the learner rather than the reverse. Angie holds a Bachelor of Early Childhood and Primary education, as well as Cert IV in Training and Assessment and an Advanced Diploma in Business Management and Leadership. Cup filling on maternity leave has also seen Angie begin to study as a celebrant, allowing her to share her connection cup with others on their special occasions. As a vocal feminist, Angie's research around the implications of language used when teaching young girls is something, she is always keen to share. Her presentations around gendered language used when teaching has forever changed the interactions of educators with children across Australia, and hopefully will have a profound impact on the formation of positive self-identities for young girls everywhere.
